CHAPTER V. NERO NOT THE LAST VIOLINIST OF HIS KIND.

HIS KIND.

Miss Carewe was at her desk, writing to Sister Cocilia, whom she most loved of all the world, when the bells startled her with their sudden clanger. The quilt learned for the startled for the startle of all the world, when the bells startled her with their sudden clansor. The quill dropped from her hand; she startled to her feet, wide-eyed, not understanding; while the whole town, drowsing peacefully a moment ago, resounded immediately with a loud confusion. She ran to the front door and looked out, her heart beating wildly.

The western sky was touched with a soft rose-color, which quickly became a warm glow, fluctuated, and, in the instant, shot up like the coming of a full Aurora. Then through the broken follage of the tree-tops could be seen the orange curis of fames, three-quarters of a mile away though they were.

People, calling loudly that "it was Carewe's warehouses," were running down the street. From the stable, old Nelson, on her father's best horse, came galloping, and seeing the white figure in the doorway, cried out in a quivering voice, without checking his steed:

"I goln'tell yo' pa. Miss Betty; he in de kentry on lan' bushess. Go back in the night, flitted by, with excited ejaculations, to join the runners, and Miss Betty followed them across the dewstrown turf in her light silppers, but at the gate she stopped.

From up the street came the sound of a bell smaller than those of the churches and courthouse, yet one that outdid all others in the madness of its appeal to clear the way. It was borne along by what seemed at first an indefinite black mass, but which—as the Aurora grew keener, producing even here a faint, yellow twilight—resolved itself into a mob of hoarse-shouting men and boys, who were running and tugging at ropes, which drew along three extraordinary vehicles. They came rapidly down the street and passed Miss Betty, with a hubbub and din beyond all understanding; one line of men, most of them in rod shirts and oil-cloth helmets, at a dead run with the hose-cart; a second line with the handengine; the third dragging the ladder wagon. One man was riding, a tall, straight gentleman in evening clothes and rush, the foure of the chief swaving over them on his high perch, while their shouting was drowned in the louder roar of greeting from the crowd, into which they and eddies of people marking the wake.

plunged as a diver into the water, swiris and eddies of people marking the wake. A moment later a section of the roof of the burning warehouse fell in, with a sonorous and reverbating crash.

The "engine company" ran the force-pump out to the end of one of the lower wharves; two lines of pipe were attached; two rows of men mounted the planks for the pumpers, and, at the word of command, began the up-and-down of the hand machine with admirable vim. Nothing happened; the water did not come; something appeared to be wrong with the mechanism. As everyone felt the crucial, need of haste, nothing could have been more natural than that all the members of the "engine company" should simultaneously endeavor to repair the defect; therefore ensued upon the spot a species of riot which put the engine out of its sphere of usefulness.

In the meantime, fifty or sixty men and boys who ran with the machines, but who had no place in their operation, being the bucket brigade, had formed a line and were throwing large pails of water in the general direction of the southernmost warehouse, which it was now impossible to save; while the gentlemen of the "nock-and-ladder company," abandoning their wagons, and armed with axes, herolcally assaulted the big door of the granary, the second building, whence they were driven by the exasperated chief, who informed them that the only way to save the wheat was to save the building, Crailey Gray, one of the laughed with his whole soul and body.

Meanwhile, by dint of shouting in men's cars when near them, through the trumpet when distant, tearing axes from their hands, imperiously gesticulating to subordinate commanders, and lingering in no one spot for more than a second, Mr. Vanrevel reduced his forces to a semblance of order in a remarkably short time, considering the confusion into which they had fallen.

The space between the burning warehouse and that next it was not more than fifty feet in width, but fifty feet so hot no one took thought of entering there; an area as discomfiting in appearance as it was beautiful with the thick rain of sparks and firebrands that fell upon it. But the chief had decided that this space must be occupied, and more; must be held, since it was the only point of defense for the second warehouse. The roof of this building would burn, which would mean the destruction of the warehouse, unless it could, be mounted, because the streams of water could not play upon it from the ground, nor, from the ladders, do much more than wet the projecting eaves. It was a gable roof, the eavest wenty feet lower on the south side than on the north, where the ladders could not hope to reach them. Vanrevel swung his line of bucketeers round to throw water, not upon the flames, but upon the ladder men.

Miss Carewe stood in the crowd upon the opposite side of the broad street. Even there her cheeks were uncomfortably hot, and sometimes she had to brush a spark from her shoulder, though she was too much excited to mind this. She was too much excited to mind this. She was too much excited to find this. She was too much excited to mind this. She was how the vapors moved there, like men walking in fire, and she was vaguely with vaporous rose-color, dotted with the myrlad red stars, her eyes shining with the reflection of their flerce heauty. She saw how the vapors moved there, like men walkin recalling Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego, when, over the silhoutted heads of the crowd before her, a long black ladder rose, wobbled, tilted crazily, then lamely advanced and ranged itself against the south wall of the second warehouse, its top rung striking ten feet short of the caves. She hoped that no one had any notion of mounting that ladder.

A figure appeared upon it immediately, that of a gentleman, bareheaded and in evening dress, with a brass trumpet swinging from a cord about his shoulders; the noise grew less; the shouting died way, and the crowd begans alwest.

helmet and uniform. The clothes of both men, drenched by the bucketeers, clung to them, steaming. As the second figure mounted, a third appeared; but this was the last, for the ladder was frail, and sagged toward the smoking wall with the weight of the three men.
